

COMMISSIONER BECKER: And you've had invitations to go deeper. If ever given the opportunity to show you, I'm sure that we could do that.

Incidentally, that's a very good point. I wish there was a way that you could see the steel towns away from the city proper that are up and down the river and what has happened to these places.

And we appreciate both of you hanging in here to the end. Your comments are going to be part of the record. I can't tell you what the recommendations are going to be that are going forward to Congress. We're going to struggle with this, mightily, all of us.

The Commission is very concerned regardless of which side of the political aisle they're coming from. They're all very concerned about this, and they want it to be a good report; they want it to be an accurate one, and they hope that it's influential in the progress and the future of the United States. This is what we're all struggling for.

So, thank you very much.

(Whereupon, the above-entitled U.S. Trade Deficit Review Commission meeting was concluded at 4:42 p.m.)
